

Homes are good examples of material culture. Their construction is influenced not only by local materials but also by ideas of what a home is. Homes shape the context in which family members interact, so they can influence the nonmaterial culture, including beliefs, values, and symbols. Houses, like clothes, act as symbols that communicate levels of prestige.